The images in this book were inspired by the creations of Ainsley Jane Griffin. Her sketches have been stylized and reimagined as contour line drawings. These drawings have brought joy to their creators and are intended to spread that joy to others.

Have fun, be creative, and never stop trying new things.

This image represents Ainsley's dedication to love and kindness. She encourages herself and others to be true to themselves and pursue ambitions of the heart.

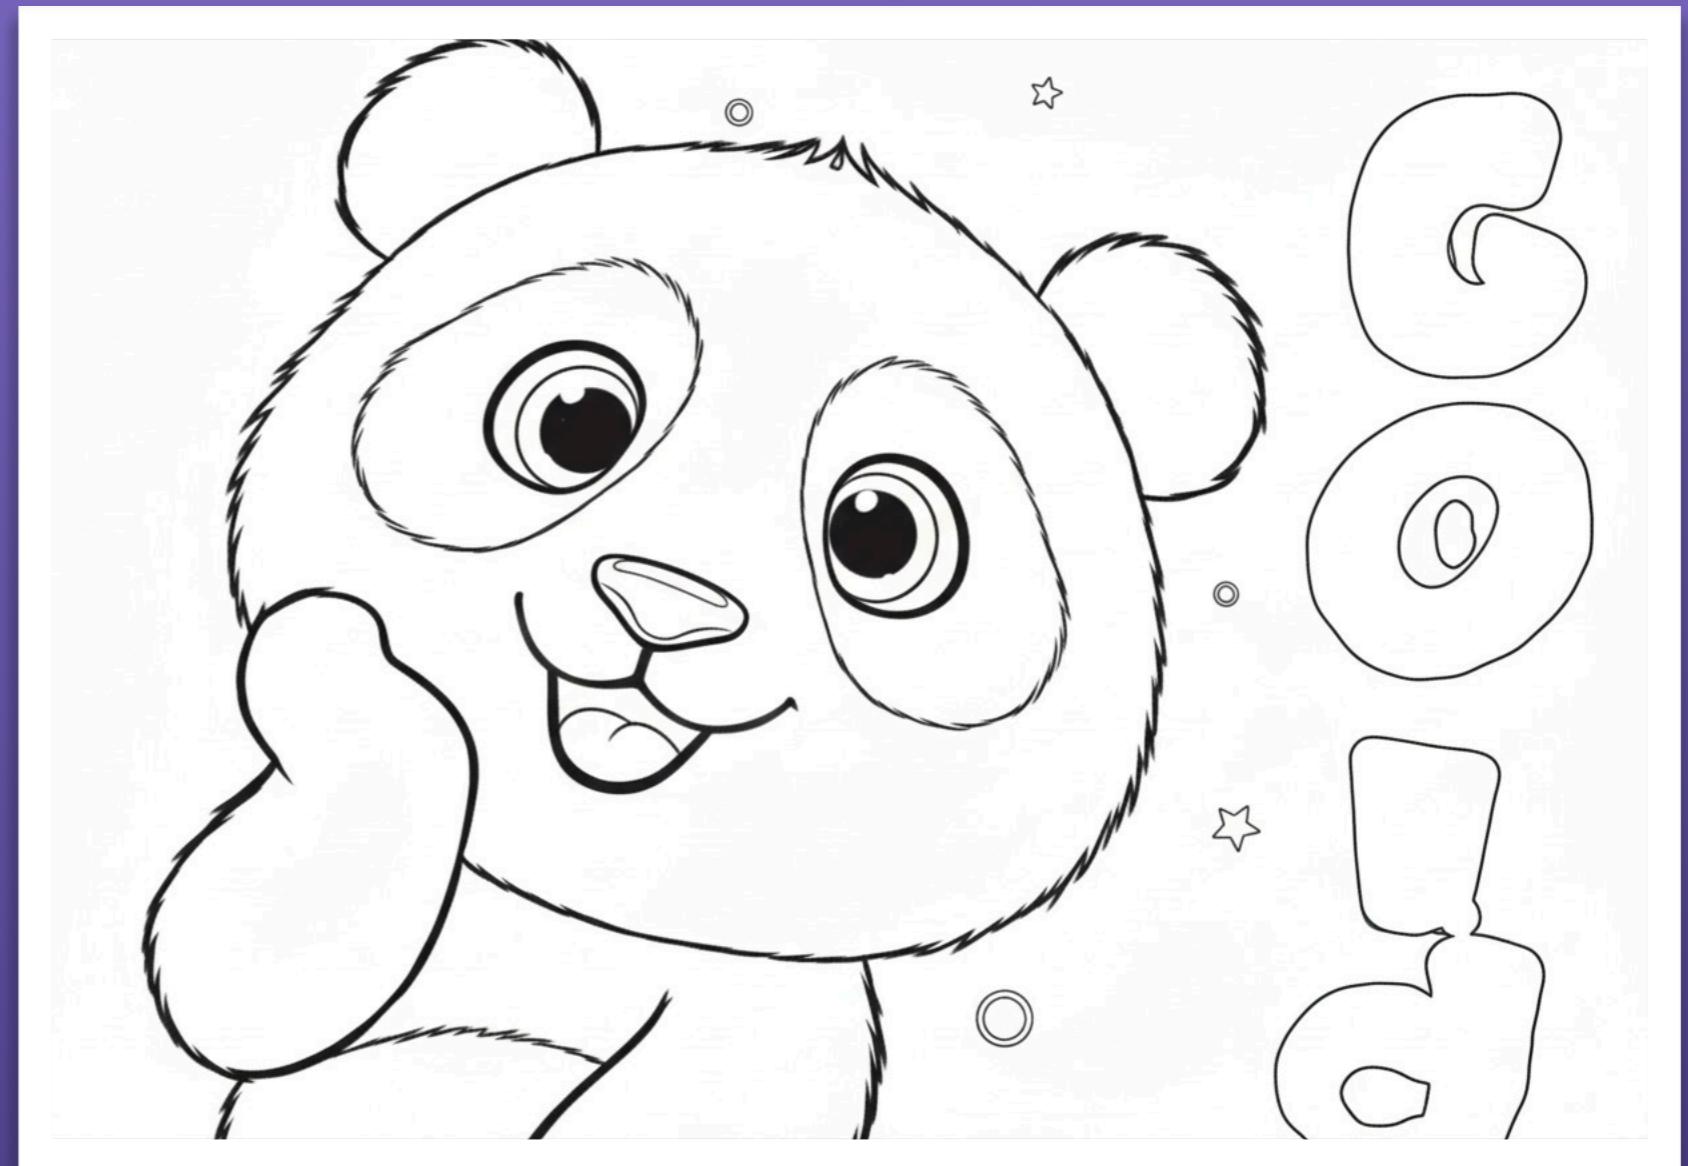

This picture should be colored in a way that speaks to the artist. Shading and highlights are encouraged but optional. One style may appeal to one artist and not another.

In the pursuit of skill refinement, an artist discovers their own ambition. They evolve as they practice and a personal touch is developed that stands on its own. Each person is unique and their style as well. Find comfort in this individual expression and allow it to bring us together as a society. The language of art is universal.

The Fun of Creating Characters

Creating the story of a character can come first or it can come last. The method is personal to the artist. Here is an example of creating characters who do not yet have stories. Maybe you can decide who they are and what they do.

In closing, I hope Ainsley has helped you as much as she has me. She loves art and she loves her friends and family. Fostering this creativity is so important and it should be fostered for you as well. The way to succeed is by spreading this positivity as much as we can.

Positive outlets for our creative expressions can bond us all together. They can help us share our feelings in the good times and help us cope through the hard times. The joy of creating can help us all feel a sense of accomplishment that builds confidence and identity.

Have fun, create, and be yourself.
